San Nicolas Highlighted In Forbes

The murals mark a new direction for San Nicolas. While it is the island's second-largest city (after the capital, Oranjestad), its downtown is barren. Residents and businesses deserted the area when Exxon closed its oil refinery in 1985, leaving empty storefronts that soon became eyesores. As San Nicolas floundered and changed into no-man's-land, the island and its visitors turned their attention to Oranjestad and later Palm Beach.

Aruban Tito Bolivar traveled to Bogota, Colombia, in 2015 and fell in love with the city's street art and the way it transformed different neighborhoods. He envisioned adopting a similar strategy back home to breathe new life into San Nicolas' dilapidated buildings.

According to Bolivar, art's popularity on the island waned in the '90s. It got a boost when a movement called Korteweg brought together a modest gathering of people to buy arts and crafts in a market setting in 2015. The following year, he formed ArtisA (which stands for "Art is Aruba"), a group that organizes local art projects, including the mural tours and the Aruba Art Fair. The launch of the three-day fair helped revitalize the art scene — it now attracts about 10,000 visitors each year.

When Bolivar began the fair in 2016, he invited 100 Aruban and international artists to town. "During the art fair we always leave murals behind as a present," he says.

As we strolled the downtown, Bolivar pointed out these gifts, which include a rainbow-hued lionfish — whose overabundance in Aruba's waters is threatening its reefs — from Amsterdam artist Dopie; a cheerful portrait of Alice van Romondt, a prominent local arts and culture advocate, by Lisbon's Odeith; and the ever-present iguana shaded in blue and leaning on a window by Bali's WD.

Curaçao artist Garrick Marchena uses trompe l'oeil techniques to make his subjects leap from the canvas. One mural shows a green-feathered prikichi, Aruba's national bird, perched on a branch. Next to it is part of a poem by Aruban nature photographer Damilice Mansur written in a fanciful font, "He who plants a tree plants life, plants faith, plants shelter, plants peace, plants hope for future generations."

"It has revived a forgotten city and now people from all over the world now are visiting San Nicolas," he says. "San Nicolas is the new place to be now."

Naomi Style Cunucu

Naomi Style Cunucu is a master builder of miniature original Aruban homes, they are all made out off Clay, and with love. Naomi shares the original Aruban homes in miniature around the world as people who see these fall in love and take one to put in their houses taking a small part of authentic Aruba with them. You can always find Naomi by her big smile and always something purple on, but her positive energy is contagious, as you admire her artwork.

You can find Naomi at most cultural events, showing her made in Aruba cunucu houses, stop by and say "Hi Naomi"

Yes it's more that obvious to everyone doing their Back To School shopping that the prices has gone way UP! most stores blame the BBO however they are the same school bags they had stored for years now they are saying because of BBO they had to raise the prices. School bags that were 25 florins are now 45 florins, and i'm not even going into the maletas that is required from some schools. There should be a better government control on these prices, because this is cutting into the budgets, for other school needs such as pants, shoes, school fee's and much more.

Lolita Statue Not Being Maintained!!!

Concerned citizens from San Nicolas for quite some time noticed that the statue of Lolita in San Nicolas is covered with salt peter. In this case they were told that a person got the task to remove the salt peter frequently, but that is not taking place. So, they decide to take matters in their own hands by using brasso to remove the lines of salt peter that covers the statue. The intention is, being the person concern is not carrying out his or her task, frequently keep our Lolita statue salt peter free. Good Job, guys, keep it up.
